The Battle of Port Palnackie

D&G harbour legal challenge reaches High Court in London

For several months now, we have kept abreast of developments at Palnackie, a small and picturesque port village with a harbour of historic significance dating back as early as the 1600s.

The diminutive size of the tiny Galloway village itself belies the potentially huge implications of the legal challenge underway, and the precedent this case will set for the future of the law surrounding trusts & beneficiaries versus the insidious corporate takeover of assets belonging to the people.

We will not attempt to go into detail about the particulars of the case here, as this has been documented more than adequately by investigative reporter Martin Geddes. Martin, for those who don't already know him, is an activist, freedom fighter, and a man after our own heart. He is a breath of fresh air in a world seemingly full to the gunwales with corrupt news media outlets and bought-off journalists.

We cannot recommend Martin's work highly enough. It can be viewed on his Substack page on this link, and his newsletters documenting the particulars of the situation at Palnackie harbour can be accessed by clicking on the images below:
